"Individualism" in its political ase, is nothing more than selfishess applied to the affairs of state; while "individuality" is a quality so desirable that all other aims in the training of a child should be considred in reference to it and sacrifice be made to foster and develop it. Now. the unfortunate confusion of the two terms, resulted in the widespread fallacy that by abrogating the competitive system we would crush out "individuality", although there is the least individuality among men engaged in the fierce strife of industria and commercial competition, and the greatest individuality among professional, literary and artistic workers, who are compelled by the very nature of their work to co-operate and fraternize. That is the hue and cry against socialism, something we do not believe in, yet which would stimulate individuality more than any other state of society we could imagine.
